The ever-spreading devastation of the night-bombers is now to be cleared away as fast as it's made. Five thousand men of the Pioneer Corps, detailed for the job, got down to the Herculean task at a score of points. The cleaning-up has a good moral effect; the damage looks nothing like so bad when the rubble's been shifted.

Special Commissioner over-seeing the job is Sir Warren Fisher, whose signature used to be on pound notes. By the time you could decipher the name you'd had to part with the note.

The Pioneers sort the wreckage as they clear it up. It will go to separate dumps and a good deal will be used for rebuilding. The sensible way to regard the damage is neither to exaggerate it, nor to make light of it, and so mislead the provinces into thinking the London bombing stories are all eyewash. It might be a good plan to use German prisoners on this work, and say, "Thee knocked it down; thee pick it up."
