They call him the Angel. He's an all-in wrestler. American scientists thought he might be a throwback to Neanderthal man, whose tribe looked like this and wouldn't have been at all flattered if they'd heard of this scientific theory.

Here's a gorilla, just after they told him the Angel was his cousin.

After the antropologists had put the 20-stone matinee-idol through several tests and measured him all ends up they discarded the throwback theory and resorted to X-Rays. That showed that the whole trouble is over-development of the pituitary glands.

In the ring, Gino Garibaldi was the latest all-in merchant to find out why this angel hasn't got wings on.

The bout ended in the good old way of this noble art.

1. WHAT IS IT? Science studies "Angel" man!
2. Maurice Tillet of France, the Angel in wrestling circles, has science baffled. Is he prehistoric man reborn?--does he resemble the primitive Neanderthal man--weird looking first cousin to all human beings? Mr. Darwin claimed this fellow was great grand pappy to us all. Today science opens its laboratories to study M. Tillet. Anthropologists try to find what makes his monstrous 276 pound frame tick. What they discover the Angel has is described in test tube language as pituitary overdevelopment, resulting in acromegaly..(to youse mugs without loarnin' dat means an extra big face and jaws) The Angel's massive head further interests scientists now from labs and x-rays to the rx wrestling ring with the Angel. He can really grapple--although at the moment his head has switched from scientific hands to more gripping tests. Gino Garibaldi does the runaround role tonight, while the Angel grunts a plaintive little lullaby to his newest victim..Yes sir, the Angel just ropes em in and they bite the dust! A free for all ah, but notice the nonchalance of the Angel winner again-and again. Ain't science wonderful!
