The veil of censorship is now lifted from these pictures of a big mechanised consignment landed in Egypt. Large numbers of tanks and field-guns, both adapted for desert use, were the fore-runners of many more shipments. While the Italians were inactive and frittering away whatever chance they had in the early summer, the British steadily reinforced men and materials.

General Wavell hastened his preparations and then struck. His well-equipped army, which included a contingent of the Free French, swept the enemy out of Egypt, and may soon drive him from every one of his African possessions.
