Even the dynamic Wendell Willkie must have been surprised by the warmth of his Midlands welcome.

(Pan Damage) He had come to see for himself how Coventry had suffered in her night of terror; and how she had taken it. He was impressed by both.

From the Council House, Mr. Willkie set out on foot.

(Spire) At the cathedral, where the spire points to the sky in protest at the wanton destruction he was conducted through the ruins by the Bishop of Coventry. Impressed by the fact that though all else fell, the spire still stood, Mr. Willkie said that to him it was symbolic.

(Pan Crowd Round Willkie) From the start Wendell Willkie has been on our side. In turn, Britain has impressed the man who, with any opponent other than Roosevelt, might today have been President of America.
