Recent events have re-opened the demand for army horses. The job of breaking them in falls to the Veterinary Corps. It's bare-back and it's no circus.

They're trained as pack-horses. The breaking-in process means a few light casualties, and a steady practice for the vet.

It's rare to see a horse with a black-eye. He's either been neighing out of his turn, or else looking through the keyhole when a mare was turning in.

The recent wintry spell was just what the vet ordered for horses exercising in the paddock. They revelled in it.

(LIE DOWN) Look ! Behaving as if you'd backed him in the 2.30.

Don't overdo it...So we can't win the war on petrol alone - a thought that must give the horses quite a kick.
