Scores of well chosen sites up and down the country are going through a quick time transformation into aerodromes. Pick and shovel have been mechanised into American Bulldozers, which admittedly shove like a bull but never doze at all. It used to take months to construct an aerodrome; now obstacles are swept away and the job finished in unbelievably short time.

Billiard-table runways take shape as fast as concrete can be mixed. These dromes are wanted for the hosts of bombers flooding from the factories of Britain and America. Quarters for the RAF go up simultaneously. The new dromes will have to be well nigh perfect, to enable the bombers to take off - with very heavy loads.
