WOMEN HELP MEN TO MAN OUR LINE.

Women's part in the war becomes daily more important. During a Royal two-day tour of the Southern Command the Queen inspected units of the A.T.S. These are the girls in uniform who do military jobs and live a military life, complete here with outdoor kitchen. The firewatchers wear the trousers, a garb that would deceive more than an incendiary.

Women at the bench serve the country no less than their sisters in khaki. A glimpse at a Spitfire factory illustrates the vital part now played by the woman worker. There are forty girls here to every sixty men, and there's room for more. Ernest Bevin has said that there's been a fine response to his appeal for a hundred-thousand women for war work. He asks employers for better co-operation than they have given so far. The Spitfire to-day is even more deadly than it was last year. Its amazing performance was demonstrated by a famous test pilot.

An army thoroughly well equipped, up-to-date and trained to the last ounce was on view as General Alexander conducted His Majesty's tour of the Southern Command. The Royal visit was no secret, In fact civilian enthusiasm was so great that the King's progress was only made possible when the troops took on the role of police.

Outside military circles there hasn't been so much talk lately about invasion. In military circles its possibility is never forgotten. Here are troops rushed to the spot to deal with an imaginary landing by five hundred parachutists. Similar manoeuvres are nowadays an army routine.

(ACROSS FIELD) Nazis were supposed to be hiding in an empty farmhouse. The King saw Tommies going to deal with the situation.

This is something very special in camouflage, not, as we wish it were Marshal Goering's widow.

A prize artillery exhibit is this twelve inch howitzer, mounted on rails, firing a shell weighing 75 pounds, a third of a ton. Having been recently set in position the great weapon was now having a calibration shoot, that is testing the margin between the gun's theoretical and actual performance.

A portable bridge for spanning small waterways was the last thing the King saw before leaving the Southern Command. It is strong enough to carry even lorries, so there was no excuse for boating.

His Majesty saw his army fighting fit, prepared for anything.
