Winston Churchill seemed in a characteristically pugnacious mood during a visit to a Bomber Command station. He saw Sterlings and Flying Fortresses. Air Chief Marshal Sir Charles Portal, Admiral Sir Dudley Pound and some Cabinet colleagues were in attendance. Of the new bombers that bode ill for the enemy detailed pictures were not allowed. Mr. Attlee and the Prime Minister were well satisfied with what they saw.

Colonel Moore-Brabazon, Aircraft Production Minister, and first civilian ever to fly in Britain, addressed Air Transport Auxiliary pilots who come from fourteen different countries.

Americans supply one-fifth of the Transport service. They deliver new planes to Air Force stations. These girls were off to Scotland.

Away they go, keeping the squadrons fully supplied for the vital war in the air.
