A village school near Harrogate is teaching the younger generation that you can get food without going to a shop for it. So many of us live in towns that millions never know the first thing about the first thing in life. - how to grow food. These youngsters are learning that lesson. So father can now send his children to his allotment, while he does their homework.

The school does more than dig for victory, it keeps pigs. Some are sold; others provide bacon.

On the average forty eggs a day come from the school fowls. By good organising all the work gets done on the farm without at all interfering with lessons.

The children keep the accounts themselves and work out how much of the produce each one will have. They're getting knowledge that'll be invaluable to the country after the war as well as now.

One result - ham! And not bombed either.
