In a formation that shows a confident outlook the Royal Army Medical Corps went into the lecture theatre at a Northern training centre. The advanced course includes lessons in anatomy. On the platform there was a manly torso, to show how the muscles work. Either that, or the man was wearing fleas next to the skin.

How to make a blood transfusion is one of the things the RAMC have to know nowadays.

(HALF-WAY THROUGH CU TRANSFUSION) There's quite an art in stretcher-bearing. If the man you're carrying threatens what he'll do to you when he gets better, you've still got something to learn.

Blindfold bandaging teaches how to give first-aid in the blackout.

Meanwhile, some infantrymen were obstacle-climbing. Why don't they go round the side ?

(2nd SV) Next came a sham battle with a few casualties to practise on. Oo! They've got me! All very amusing to look at, but it gives the army what it must have in wartime - a first class RAMC.
