An Australian Sunderland squadron was visited by workmen who make instruments for these giant flying-boats of the Coastal Command. They came to hear whether the pilots are satisfied with the workmanship - as to which they were soon re-assured. As a memento of the visit the men presented their hosts with a panel, mounted with two instruments used in blind flying.

For the visitors the big spot of the afternoon was a flight in a Sunderland. Workers generally say good-bye to the tools of war when manufacture's completed. These men had the thrill of seeing the fruits of their labour on active service. Sunderlands patrol half across the Atlantic as a matter of routine. As near to being invincible as any aircraft can be, they're armed above and below, front and rear.

(2nd worker) British workmen are turning out the incomparable planes that RAF valour deserves.
