INVASION PREPARED.

Men of a U.S. armoured unit paraded at their headquarters for inspection by the three invasion leaders, Eisenhower, Tedder and Montgomery. Never was any military project more thoroughly prepared. Great storehouses, of which this is typical, are packed to capacity with engines of war and food for the enormous army the Americans have now assembled in Britain. The well nigh illimitable productive resources of the United States are behind the invasion. When the armies land in Europe they will lack nothing that is in the power of Britain and America to provide.

(19 Chiefs) General Eisenhower has shown that he possesses the rare ability to weld armies of different countries into a united striking force, imbued with the spirit of the crusade.

(After Monty) Eisenhower, Tedder and Montgomery were an invincible team in Africa and will be so again. Fully aware that the task ahead of them is the toughest in military history they are confident that the invading armies will triumph.

Spearhead in the assault of Europe will be the airborne division, a mass manoeuvre established that British paratroops, the RAF and the U.S. Airforce have perfected their combined operations.

(Next) Never before have pictures been taken of so many paratroops in the air. The path of the paratroops has been smoothed by the day and night bombing of German airplane factories. When the great day comes, full air cover will be provided by the invasion chiefs. The Commander in chief has the confidence of all. So has his deputy; so indeed has the great man who on European soil will command the British.
