

FLASH

Men of the Army Service Corps ran the buses when transport workers went on an unofficial strike against the summer working hours. It was all very improvised, but it got the people to and from work. Army lorries were used on trolley-bus routes. Hundreds of travellers could only find standing room, so they didn't notice the difference. For the soldiers it was a change of job and they enjoyed it. The busmen say that the new schedules give them less time to themselves. Be that as it may, the army got the people to work, and in wartime that's the main thing.