

BRITISH AIRCRAFT SHOW

forty-eight aircraft of the latest type were on view at the Handley-Page Airfield, Radlett, in the Eighth Exhibition organized by the Society of British Aircraft Constructors. Buyers from nearly fifty foreign countries were among the visitors. ~~Buyers~~ ^{Buyers} from Iraq inspected the ~~latest~~ ^{new} Hawker Fury, and everybody was interested in the latest scientific horror, the radio-controlled rocket bomb, the sort of thing ^{with} which unfriendly countries could exchange greetings if the world ^{were} foolish enough to have another war. The giant Avro Tudor is a ^{handsome} contribution to civil flying. The four-engined monster can carry sixty passengers.

The Handley-Page Hastings is a military transport plane. However, the army hasn't got the monopoly of such things; commercial air-transporters have thoroughly established themselves. The exhibition showed that British aircraft producers can offer the best in the world.
