

New York, in common with a lot of America from the Atlantic to the Rockies, and way down south, hasn't any doubt that winter ^{is} ~~has~~ come at last. One of the biggest snowfalls for many years, ~~made~~ the skyline look like a Christmas card. ~~It~~ was the sort of beauty the men who'd only just got over delivering Christmas cards could have done without.

The city mobilised its winter machinery, which ~~shaves~~ bulldozes, ~~minces the stuff, and minces the stuff,~~ and minces the stuff, all but makes it into ice cream. All very nice to look at, if it doesn't happen here.

LET'S TALK ABOUT THE WEATHER

Snow -- uncounted tons of the fleecy white stuff; for the northeastern part of the country, worst storms in many years! "More coming" is the word from the weather bureaus. They offer meteorological proof -- the real proof is everywhere to be seen.

New York City becomes one vast Great White Way -- a picture postcard, like a belated holiday greeting -- a means of compensation perhaps, for the white Christmas the kiddies misses.

There's a familiar slogan for this adherence to duty...

but for this kind of "duty" there are hardly words of description.

From New England to the Rockies, and deep into the South -- snow, and rain and sleet. Southerners get a taste of a rarity -- reminder of few and far between snowfalls. Authorities in the hard-hit northeast warn motorists to leave their cars at home. Everybody wants to "talk about the weather" -- it's always front-page news! But who's been saying the winters have been getting milder?!
