KITCHEN MAGIC

Here's your answer to stooping and stretching, mother, in this kitchen of tomorrow— an electronic wonderland. Knobs and panels are practically non-existent for this is all push-button. A built-in toaster, right in the stove area. and now -- real Kitchen magic: A wave of the hand, and -- presto -- a wall cabinet, almost out of nowhere. A photographic menu and recipe viewer. To get into the refrigerator, mother, just push a button. Since we still have to use a chopping block -- this kitchen hasn't eliminated that need, at least not yet, we can always raise the block to a convenient height.

Not that rotisseries are ugly sights to be hidden; but why keep it exposed when a button raises it, another button opens it?

And here's your roast, mother, done to a turn.

Who said anything about kitchen drudgery?

"FLYING FUSELAGE"

In Santa Ana, California, the "Flying Fuselage," priming for a test flight. An amazing sight to behold is this experimental craft, built at a cost of 100-thousand dollars. The wingless plane, measuring 26 feet across the fuselage, reaches 44 feet when the flaps are extended for flight.

According to William Horton, the builder, the Air Force is interested in the design of his flying fuselage.

The radically-designed plane works on the principle of fencing in velocity pressure at the fuselage's outer edges. Air passing over the fuselage gives the entire surface lifting ability. Another of aviation's pioneer efforts.

MAGIC KITCHEN NOW, WOMAN'S WORK NEVER STARTS

Science has been a long time coming to the kitchen but the all-electric wonder exhibited at the Waldorf Astoria hotel makes up for lost time. Everything opens and closes at the touch of a button; women'll have to invent another complaint in place of the one about spending hours over a hot stove. A wave of the hand - the photo-electric cell <sup>bring</sup> opens the cupboard <sup>to hand,</sup> with the main dish ready for the oven. Another wave closes it.... But what'll go with it? The menu-selector suggests pickles and <sup>sliced</sup> chopped tomato. ~~The shopping~~ <sup>The part of job still</sup> has to be done by hand, but the <sup>chopping</sup> block can be set at the height she wants. Anne Boleyn had to ~~hand~~ kneel down.

It's all so fascinating, the whole family'll squabble to do the cooking... * The roast's done to a turn.... There's only one other button wanted - <sup>one to</sup> ~~to~~ bring father home in a good temper, ~~for a change.~~
