

ROYAL TOUR

From Captain MacDonald ^{of} Balrawald Her Majesty accepted Stuart a length of Royal ~~Stuart~~ Tartan, a present from the people ^{to} ~~who~~ mark the royal visit to North Uist. There are so many 20 places in the Western Isles, there could be no more than brief stays ^{any} everywhere. The Queen and Duke continued north, visiting Harris, world-renowned as the origin of the famous tweed, before re-boarding the royal yacht for the night.

At Stornaway General O'Connor, Lord Lieutenant for Ross and Cromarty, welcomed the Queen to the island of Lewis, largest and most northern of the Outer Hebrides. The ~~large~~ ^{big} 20 herring-curing station was informally inspected, the Queen and DUKE Speaking to some of the fisher lasses, busy on export ^{orders} ~~from~~ from Russia. The tweed mill of MacKenzie Ltd., took the interest of both the royal sisters. The Harris 40 Tweed Association presented the Queen with some cloth.
Lastly the Tumpan Head Lighthouse was visited, much to the joy of the children. Prince Charles had been shown round ^{earlier} ~~when the lighthouse was busy elsewhere~~, so he not only 60 explained everything but helped ^{to} ~~the~~ lighthouse keeper to sound the first blast on ~~the~~ new fog horn. Leith, Port of Edinburgh, welcomed the Queen to the mainland. On the 80 quay, exercising their privilege to attend upon royalty, were the High Constables of Leith. The Scottish capital now waited to acclaim the Queen.
