GLIDER .

A new kind of glider makes its bow. It may also be fitted with an engine, but it is as a motorless plane that it is demonstrated here. A notable feature is its absence of tail, balance being maintained by the special triangle construction of the wings.

Holland has a new air-liner known as the tricycle plane --- so-called from its type of landing gear. With a wheel in front it is able to exert more than the usual braking power when landing. It is also claimed to be more comfortable for passengers, even though it does look as though it's been filleted.

PHONE BELL.

You all know how irritating the ring of a telephone can be --- and the post office thinks that that may account for some of the subscribers being a bit snappy. That was the early type of bell. And even the one in use to-day is far from soothing.

But the Post Office are shortly to introduce a more melodious bell.
