

SHANGHAI.

415

Admiral Sir Charles Little commanding the British Naval Forces ~~at the Outer Station~~, has paid a call on General Matsui, supreme Japanese Commander at Shanghai. Also ~~with the Japanese~~ ^{present was} Brigadier General ~~Smith~~ Telfer-Smollett, commanding Britain's land forces. ~~American and French officers were among others who met the invading commander in this first interview since the war began.~~ On the other side is Madame Kai Shek --- gallant wife of the Chinese Generalissimo. Educated in America, she has been indefatigable in helping her husband in his losing battle. Chiang Kai Shek, Dictator of what is left of China, reviewed his 49th Division on the eve of battle --- and the air force put on a martial sky parade to show they still have the will to fight on. After the review, troops left to move into the new theatres of war --- near Hongkong. Upon the Purple Mountain above Nanking is the Tomb of Sun Yat Sen. The monument to the Father of ~~the~~ modern China ~~has fallen to the hands of the Japanese to say.~~ has fallen to the land of the Rising Sun. In the Shansi Province on the Northern front, the crack 49th Division moved up from the walled city of Tunkwan to meet the new onslaughts of the invader, and the refugees straggled on their endless journey. Meanwhile, --- what of Shanghai? The battered seaport has now been ravaged anew by flood --- yet it was here that our cameraman found comic relief. Even the ducks were too fed up to swim. Alas --- poor Shanghai! Beset by the Rising Sun and the rising water. Thank heaven we've got a Navy!