IN THE WAKE OF THE NAZI.

The jagged outline of the Cassino Abbey framed against a leaden sky. The battle for Monastery Hill is over, and amid the ruins which crown it, move Allied soldiers clambering over the great heaps of masonry. The whole place exudes an atmosphere of death and destruction.

Machine gun pits vacated by the Germans are taken over. Snipers Vantage points and observation posts from which the Germans peered down on our lines--the Abbey which the Germans converted into a Fortress.

It is hard to imagine how the place must have looked. This seems to have been the Cloisters - there is still faint evidence of this in its archways, but much evidence to show how the Germans used it as a Mortar position.

A German replica of the American Bazooka. Another weapon fired from the commanding height of Cassino Abbey. This great edifice was big and thick and long and sacred, and full of precious things.

Here are Germans who fought their last fight around Cassino. In this batch are not quite as many as there were Allied airmen in the shooting affair at Stalag Luft 3. These German captives are entering their prison camps in the sure knowledge that they will receive food and treatment in accordance with International Law. Bear these facts in mind as we bring you evidence of Hun Brutality inflicted on the civilian population of their erstwhile Ally Italy. These are the sounds and scenes at a refugee collection centre located in the square of a small Italian town. People plundered by the Germans and left to starve. People broken in mind and body.

Individual cases are brought to our notice, such as this one.

Sitting over here is a family suffering the torments of starvation. For three weeks they have been feeding on grass and roots.

The little boy they are bringing in was dying of starvation. that's his grandmother next to him.

Carry the memory of these faces with you. A handful of people out of Europe's millions who owe their plight to Nazi Germany and the Germany of our yesterdays before the NAME Nazi was coined--the Germany which by any other name would be as foul - the Germany with the black record which has stained the Centuries of man.

Machine gun pits vacated by the Germans are taken over. Snipers Vantage points and observation posts from which the Germans peered down on our lines--the Abbey which the Germans converted into a fortress.

It is hard to imagine how the place must have looked. This seems to have been the Gestapo's - there is still faint evidence of this in its architecture, but much evidence to show how the Germans used it as a fortress.

A German replica of the American Baroque. Another weapon fired from the commanding height of Cassino Abbey. This great edifice was big and thick and long and solid, and full of precious things.

Here the Germans who fought their last fight from Cassino. In this place are not only as many as there were Allied soldiers in the shooting machine at Cassino. These German captives are entering their prison camps in the same knowledge that they will receive food and treatment in accordance with international law. But these facts in mind as we bring you evidence of the brutality inflicted on the civilian population of their erstwhile ally Italy.

These are the wounds and sores of a nation's collection centers located in the ruins of a small Italian town. People plundered by the Germans and left to starve. People broken in mind and body.

Individual cases are brought to our notice, such as this one. Sitting over here is a family suffering the torments of starvation. For three weeks they have been feeding on grass and roots.

The little boy they are bringing in was dying of starvation. That's his grandmother next to him.
