SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

We the Peoples of the United Nations --- Momentous opening words of the great Charter for world peace.
At San Francisco two hundred men and women of 50 Nations laboured to build an organization that will outlaw war for all time, President Truman attends the last session of this conference which the whole world has anxiously watched. The President meets many famous guests. Among them, General Smuts, who was a delegate at that other peace conference at Versailles, and Admiral Nimitz, under whose command British and American ships are hammering at the doors to Japan. At the famous Opera House, the assembled delegates hear a call for their final vote from the chief of the British delegation, Lord Halifax.

Nation by Nation the delegates cast their votes - fifty peoples pledged to peace.

Now, the final signing of the Charter. For Britain, Lord Halifax.

Edward Stettinius, chief of America's delegation to the world security Council. For the third "Big Three" Partner, Mr. Gromyko, ambassador to Washington.

For China, first Nation to be attacked, Dr. Wellington Koo paints his signature.

The Charter of mankind's deepest hopes. Humanity demands that this be the Magna Carta of lasting peace. Final speech of the Conference was given in characteristic spirit by President Truman.

The Allied World salutes the spokesmen of nations which stand for peace. San Francisco has made a beginning - a courageous stand that promises to build a mighty structure for peace. A Charter born of the agony and destruction of total war. It must mark a turning point in human history. A new way reaches to the future - the world must follow it through unity and co-operation to lasting peace.
