DINING CARS COME BACK.

The Flying Scotsman, Britain's best known express, gives passengers a sight they haven't seen since 1941. Restaurant cars and railway kitchens are back again - wars may come and wars may go, but the sausage goes on for ever. For men who've been off the job for four years, the chefs look pretty slick. But Chef Heck and cook Whenech are old hands at the game.

The old restaurant cars, with their ornate fittings and fanciful names are not back yet. Today's diners are on utility lines, ordinary pullman coaches with table cloths. The dining car team were all doing the same job on the same train before the war. It's not easy to serve the soup when the Scotsman is topping 60 miles an hour.

Our cameraman covering the come back of the dining car reports the feed good for the times. Long distance travellers tell veteran conductor Richards they certainly appreciate it.
