

RED DEVILS RE-VISIT ARNHEM

Few of Europe's battlegrounds will live longer or more vividly in the minds of British soldiers than Arnhem. Returning there on the first of many a pilgrimage, men of the Red Devils relive that magnificent losing fight, as glorious as any victory when the sky rained men to form the spearhead of the drive to Berlin.

The scars of war remain, robbed of their harshness, but still bearing reminders of what was done there. This visit may be no more than an isolated example of many similar ones which British servicemen will make in Europe to the people or the places they knew in war. This camera-report, exclusive to Pathe is made to symbolize the spirit which lies behind such visits.

Among the good friends sought out by the airborne men was a woman who sheltered and cared for British wounded in her cellar during the German counter-attack. There are many friends like her in Europe to whom British soldiers will wish to say, "Thank you."
