

U.N. DELEGATES AT GUILDHALL

At London's historic Guildhall, the Lord Mayor and City Corporation gave a reception and dinner to United Nations delegates. Many ancient ceremonial customs were revived, among them the passing of the loving cup.

SOUND

Labour Ministers were there in force to hear the Lord Mayor propose the toast of the United Nations, and the delegates replied through M. Spaak. But the event of the evening was the Prime Ministers tribute to London.

SOUND (SPEECH)

From an evening of personalities, the camera brings back character studies of men new at the end of stage one in the building of world peace. France's M. Bidault, survivor of his country's political crisis and pensive Herbert Morrison, with a feed-anxious House of Commons to face in the morning, Emir Feisal was there, man of the east and second of Ibn Saud's sixty sons. And while M. Spaak wore his famous Churchillian expression, Mr. Attlee had the cigar.
