NEWSBRIEFS

In route for their holiday at Balmoral, the King and Queen arrive at Ballater station. News of their coming had gone well ahead bringing out a crowd and a military guard of honour.

Their Majesties begin what we hope will be a very happy holiday.

Movie cameras are the latest helpers in the police drive for greater road safety. This unit works at Chelmsford. Its aim is to clear the streets of silly cyclists, bad drivers and jay walkers. And for picking out the mistakes, there's nothing to beat the camera.

People who never look where they're going - Chelmsford has 'em spotted.

Things are moving, too, at Withenshove, Manchester. Swinging from under the tarpaulin is the latest thing in homes. Running into place on rollers, it's an aluminium house. Everything ultra-modern, it has one old fashioned drawback. When you kick it, it gives out a rather embarrassing sound.

On the inside, cupboards and fittings are all ready fixed. A metal-worker's dream, all set for new homes in Aluminium Avenue.

Empty storage tanks tell the latest instalment of the sad tale of London's gas muddle. After last Winter's hardship the new unofficial strike really puts the light out. You want a cup of tea? This is how you get it in gas-less London. To prepare a dinner, you need the experience of an army field cook. While management and men swap charges and counter-charges, the public, as usual, takes the rap. Next thing, they'll be back in the Anderson shelters.
