PEOPLE IN CAMERA

Enter the water diviners. A test of their strange powers, with sceptical scientists doing a check-up. The search for water in Sweden. Over here it might lead you to the local pub.

Our cameraman tells us the ace performers were 70 year old Anders Nordlung and Mrs. Klida Ohlson. If they'll find us a red that divines mild-and-bitter we'll sit up and take notice.

This is Hoxton. Tenement ridden blackspot in London's East End. The mark of the atom was upon it in 1939; war pushed it further into delapidation. But we looked over the wall into a hidden personal heaven. Here lives a woman who loves flowers and farm-yard life, so she's brought them to her own back-door. Her name, Mrs. Nellie Neale.

Among the blitz-rains, a farmyard is a back-yard.

There's colour, and peace. And when there's a bit of sun, Mrs. Neale gets it.

A bit of heaven - in Hoxton.

Meet the thousand-mile feet of Bert Cousens. For ten days they've been going round Romford Stadium - keeping the dogs in trim.

Idea is to cover 1,000 miles in 15 days. Walker Cousens must not let one hour pass, day or night, without spending part of it on the walk. So far, he's had 3 hours sleep in a week.

Scene, Royal Balmoral. Page two in the Scottish Diary of General Ike. A welcome to the General, his wife and son. Last month the U.S. Ambassador to Britain went home. Pathe News has since received many letters saying that when his army job is done, the United States could name no finer representative in this country than General Eisenhower. We endorse that opinion.

Kindly, informal, and greeted as a friend by His Majesty and the British people, we hope one day to speak of Ambassador Ike.
