

IT MAY NEVER HAPPEN AGAIN

Here's a report on heat wave weekend. The hottest break for seven years, we may have to remember it as the one weekend that made the Summer. In the South of England, sun-happy people spent two wonderful days, with the temperature at 87 degrees in the shade. Fashionable bathing costumes followed the Board of Trade's advice to save textiles. Open air fans were after a place in the sun, and an escape from sweltering city crowds. To man and beast, it was a weekend they wouldn't forget.

All previous heat wave records broken, flaming June made a triumphal entry. The worst Winter of the century seemed years away, and the people of this weather-crazy Island made the best of their one tropical weekend. But while City folks were taking things easy, farmers were working without pause. There was no day off for them - they were on the job Saturday and Sunday to make up for winter's setbacks.
