Winding up their Scottish tour, the Royal Family crossed by launch from the mainland for a visit to Arran. No member of the Royal Family has set foot here since King Edward VII and Queen Alexandra toured the island in 1902. The island's youngest representatives were there to extend a royal greeting.

In the grounds of Bredrick Castle, a tree was planted by the Princess who will one day be Queen. Lieutenant Philip, too, left a living reminder of the Royal visit.

At one of Arran's big dairies, Their Majesties saw proof of the island's growing economy. With her future husband at the wheel, Princess Elizabeth drives round the island. Ancient Arran will remember its Royal tourists.

On Genisten Water, Cumberland, a near-escape from disaster. Putting Bluebird through another pre-record-attempt test, Sir Malcolm Campbell - blinded by driving rain - had to skid the jet speedboat to avert collision with the bank.

Commander Du Sme, the speedboat's designer, is still unsatisfied with Bluebird's performance. For him and Sir Malcolm some more overhauling.
