dealt out as before; the people of Mottingham, led by Lord Mayer Shaw, went gay at the Goese Fair.

One of the oldest Fairs in Britain, it is the Gity's annual day of merry-making. Thousands of Nettingham's citizens directed themselves to the Fairground for a few hours "away from it all."

Nottingham certainly had quite a day. But there was no future in it for the goese.

Although the nation's women would perform miracles this winter with their four-a-month clothing coupons, they still talked about fashions which were out of their reach. From Paris came the latest autumn styles. Calf length skirts have won the battle of the hem-line. Wistfally envious, British women can only lengthen their utility freeks. For evening wear, Paris has gone in mainly for black and white designs.

Meanwhile, British women will have to go on elething themselves in their imagination while awaiting the day when they return to pre-war elegance.

There were also sports thrills for people able to find a little off-duty time. Near Bradford in Yerkshire, the vagabonds Motor Club held a motor cycle scramble.

Twenty four riders race round a tough course, and it's here that they get to the stickiest part.

Making the most of the "Indian summer" weather, motor cycling fans came to pettery fields from all over Yorkshire.

With basic petrol cuts now operating, we may have to wait a long time for the next motor eyele gramble.

But it was hard to keep International politics off the front pages. During the week came the earefully publicised announcement from Warsaw of a mine-country Communist tie-up. This meant virtually a new Comintern to succeed that dissolved by Stalin in 1945. Into this move fitted the Saar elections. As European Communists proclaimed the future co-ordination of their activities, the Saar voted on a simple issue. Superficially, it was for a new Landtag, the Constituent Assembly. In Hard fact, the Saar people polled for an economic tie with France or Germany.
