

THE PEOPLE

Personalities who claimed the limelight in the week's news were found in Paris. A film workers demonstration disturbed the calm of the French capital's Sunday. In a march along the Boulevards, film industry employees aired their views. Jean Marais led the demonstrators with Madeleine Sologne. Also there was Charles Bussieres, and up-and-coming-star Simone Simonet.

The film workers claim that the agreement permitting American films to enter France is killing French productions. At the Madeleine, thousands of fans waited while the stars indulged in some real off-screen rough stuff. Eager spectators came to the rescue as the police went into action.

French police - well experienced in the handling of protest meetings - drew batons to break up the crowds. For the man in the street it was a lively afternoon for even a Continental Sunday.
