

THE OLD WARRIOR COMES HOME.

3

MARRAKESH... Summer capital of Morocco where western custom and habit has only lightly touched. Here the ancient civilisation of a world almost unknown has for six weeks been in the nation's news. For it was the visit of Winston Churchill that focussed on Marrakesh the attention of an anxious world. To tell the story, Pathe joined Britain's war leader as he recuperated.

Marrakesh was founded before William the Conqueror came to England. It's people's habits have changed little since then. Men still wear the hooded robe. Women still cling to their traditional dress. A sleepy shabby city, it has a picturesque enchantment all its own.

On the edge of the desert stands the twentieth century contribution ... the Mamouni Hotel - temporary residence of Mr. Churchill.

From his hotel balcony, Winston Churchill looked down on what he described as "the most beautiful place in the world". In his first floor suite, he rested. In the hotel grounds, amid paths shaded by palms, and lined with orange trees, heavy and golden with their shining fruit, Mr. Churchill regained his strength.

During walks with members of his party, these pictures were taken.

Britain's robust warrior was restored to full vigour as he planned to return home to the perplexities of political life.

Once again the nation breathed a sigh of thankfulness.

CHURCHILL.
