PEOPLE IN CAMERA

The Shah of Iran shatters the popular conception of the appearance of a Shah of Persia. In the uniform of a Marshal of the Iranian Air Force, he strikes a note of elegance worthy of Savile Row. Welcomed at Buckingham Palace by the King, he is treated to a dress display by the King's Guard. Wearing full dress scarlet and bearskins, the Coldstreamers save our reputation in the matter of ceremonial attire.

The attire of Royalty is the job of Norman Hartnell. Of Britain's lead in fashion, he says:

SOUND

The royal touch on beautiful new fabrics brings a high return in less spectacular imports.

This matter of elegance touches the Royal Household again in the person of Mr. Fred Turk. As His Majesty's Swan Keeper it is his duty to ensure that the graceful Royal Swans continue to decorate the Thames rather than fly off to less favoured reservoirs and common duckponds of their own choosing. Every year he heads a fleet of Swan uppers to search the river for the newly hatched cygnets.

The job is no easy one. The swan uppers row hundreds of miles and catching the young swans calls for a high degree of skill. Mama Swan is particularly unco-operative in the business and she usually has a better idea of the local waters than the hardworking gentlemen who are chasing her.

Patience wins in the end. Mother and offspring are cornered by a group of skiffs and hauled aboard. Although only the cygnet needs attention, it is healthier to get Mother Swan aboard as well. The object is to clip the cygnet's wing so that it can't fly from the reaches of the river.

A dab of tar marks the particular bird "Crown Property" and the work is done. For the swans it's an undignified performance, but the job maintains that continuity of grace which decorates the Thames.
