

LIGHTS GO ON AGAIN

The Bright-lights of London (and the rest of Britain) prepare to go on again as the 10-year ban is lifted. Getting ready for the nation-wide Saturday night light up, neon glass workers blow out the shape of illuminations to come. It's thanks to improvement in the coal situation that all-night shop windows, flashing signs and street-lighting can now return to the old pre-war gaiety. Even bigger and better displays are promised.

Seaside towns like Brighton and Blackpool are dusting off switches for illuminations not seen since four days before the war.

With the lights going on again in London, there's life in the old town yet.
