KOREA LANDING: FIRST PICTURES.

Heading for Korea the first amphibious task force since world war two moves swiftly through the Pacific. An Army-Navy team commands. At sea, Rear-Admiral Doyle, veteran of Guadalcanal; on shore, Major-General Gay, one time Chief of Staff to General Patton, and a tank expert.

Under a British-American air umbrella, the armada arrives off Pohang and the landing-craft go in. It's a tense moment. The Reds are known to be only a few miles away.

But the Reds are caught napping and the U.S. First Cavalry Division - the men who liberated Manila - establish a beach-head unopposed. No details are available, but undoubtedly, it's a sizeable force. Already units have been reported in action on various parts of the long front.

First job is to guard Pohang from North Korean troops coming down the East Coast. The next, to rush re-inforcements to the thinly manned front. Now comes news of a U.S. mystery force on the South Coast. It's early days yet, but in the end it may well prove that the decisive move was the landing at Pohang.
