ROYAL BABY GOES NORTH WITH PRINCESS ELIZABETH

At King's Cross station, Princess Elizabeth makes her first public appearance outside Clarence House since the birth of her daughter as she arrives to start on her long journey to Balmoral to join the King and Queen. But it's Princess Anne who steals the public interest as she makes her first public appearance. Only there's not much you can see of her, she's well wrapped up against the chilly weather.

With the Princess looking after her daughter, Nurse Lightbody puts Prince Charles on the train. And now the most famous little family in the world is on its way in the Aberdonian to show the baby to grandfather - like any other little family. For the King has not yet seen his grand-daughter.

On doctors' orders the King went to Balmoral to rest just before Princess Anne was born.

At Ballater Station Princess Elizabeth steps out with Prince Charles in close attendance.

The Provost, Canon Adam is there to welcome them.

Prince Charles hasn't much to complain about, but then Nurse Lightbody arrives with that new sister of his, Princess Anne.

It's very boring for an important young man to find himself suddenly not the centre of attraction. And obviously just now nobody seems to be interested in him ... except the cameraman.

That's better ... Princes aren't supposed to go off on their own - at least, not so young. Princess Anne is still detained making her first bow to Scotland.

In the heart of the people, Princess Elizabeth has long held a special place which her little family makes warmer and more secure.
