THE PINCERS CLOSE

Into captured Inches ships pour supplies to feed the drive on Seoul, all the vast requisites of modern war, assembled and delivered to schedule. And at nearby Kimpo airfield huge troop-carriers and sixty-six flying bex-cars land with re-inforcements within 2½ hours of its capture. Within a few days, 9,000 men completely equipped join the big offensive. General Shepherd, Commander of the Marines and first to land at Kimpo, inspects a burnt-out Yak fighter.

Giant rubber ponteens will carry a 900-foot Bailey bridge, being flown in to cross the Han River.

On the South front the Argyll and Sutherlands switch to the offensive as the pincers start to close, and tough South Koreans, tired after months of hard fighting, grin as the tide turns. Hearby on Taegu airfield Australian mustangs bomb up to spearhead the break-out. From some deep-hidden source exhausted men find the little extra that makes a man, and they turn to rend the aggressor.

When the enemy proves stubborn they call up the air force - and from Taegu airfield the Australians roar into the air. There's a camera on one of them and from air and ground we bring you the most dramatic air attack pictures of the war.

Back up North the ANTRACS move towards the Han River. Before the pincers can work, these men - veterans and unblooded youngsters must capture Seoul. Berrage has prepared the way, but as they cross the wide river, they'll be a sitting target. And so will our cameramen who goes with them.

Before supplies can follow them, they've got to make a beach-head and hold it. Deploying with anti-temk basockas the Marines seize commanding points, whilst others clear the surrounding country. When life can be a matter of minutes the little things assume importance. Living the fleeting moments seems more important than life itself." Back to base the prisoners begin to stream. Sometimes they carry hidden gremades. It's safer to bring them in like this.

They're dressed like the civilians in this strange country, and the man who shot at you, next moment becomes a peaceful citizen, merged in the background and ready to hit again when you're off guard. But now leyal South Koreans come forward to point the finger, and the Yanks go in. One fanatic with a machine-gum can do a lot of damage - perhaps even hold up a time-table and endanger the lives of hundreds. The tape that binds him is just strong enough to delay a sudden break for liberty.

Pield-dressing stations keep close-up with the advance. Victory has not been cheap. Plight, which brought man terror, also gives him life, hasting the wounded back to base. Among the wounded moves a priest, a little man comforting the stricken and bringing peace to those whose hour has run.

To the hadly wounded, blood from their homeland brings life, replacing the blood they so freely gave that freedom might live. But for others the little priest can only make smooth the way.

When time was being bought with lives, a young American said in death "There must be better ways to settle a dispute." Korea has given his answer. When all the people of the world will it, man will live in peace and die honoured in his own bed.
