COMMONWEALTH SHEEP SHOW

Special freight planes bring fifty-seven stud sheep to the Royal Sydney Sheep Show. They come from Hay in New South Wales and they're worth £40,000. And that isn't hay. Entries in this year's show are the heaviest for years.

Judging takes place indoors because of heavy rain outside. The choice isn't easy when every competitor is a potential champion. And don't they know it!

The judges are experts. You can't pull the wool over their eyes. With sheep worth anything up to £2,000 you have to keep close guard - even at the Shearground.

The Blue Ribband for the Grand Ram Champion goes to a little known breeder. Mr. F. O. Gobbert is congratulated by the President of the Sheep Breeders Association. A quarter of the world's wool comes from that far corner of the Commonwealth. On the sheep's back Australia rides the road to prosperity.
