BRITAIN TO VOTE

It's a sell-out for the paper-boys as a General Election suddenly looms in sight. Intelligent anticipation or inspired guess, it focuses attention on the only man who knows the answer, and there's excitement as Mr. Attlee leaves No. 10. Then with a hard winter ahead and threat of a split in his party, the Premier makes this dramatic broadcast announcement.

Eighteen months ago Labour was returned with a bare majority. Election night is recalled by these excited scenes which may well be eclipsed on the night of October 25th. Until then each party prepares for the coming fight. Lord Woolton swings the Tory organisation into action even as Margan Phillips gets cracking for Labour. The Liberals will be there, too, but once again it will resolve into a two-party struggle. But this time, the manifestoes will have few easy promises to offer. This time whether Labour rules or Tory, a hard road lies ahead. Well, let's hear what some of the veterans think of the news:-
