

COYOTE HUNT

From a tiny Canadian village in Saskatchewan "snowmobiles" leave to hunt coyotes or prairie wolves which are killing poultry and sheep in vast numbers. Fitted with skis in front and tracks behind, the motor sleighs can reach high speed over the snow. Poison or traps are the more usual way of killing coyotes. There's one new! The motor speeds up to 50 and the chase is on!

And that's one pest less to rob Canadian farms.

X A snowmobile roars out of the tiny Canadian village of Abernethy, Saskatchewan, after reports that coyotes have again been seen preying on poultry and sheep. Each year Canada loses thousands of dollars in stock to the wily, dog-like animals. Poison and traps are the standard method of destroying ~~them~~^{coyotes,} but some Canadians track ~~them~~ them by motor.

X There's one now, and the mad chase at fifty miles an hour begins to get within shooting distance.

X The coyote is within range now -- a bead is drawn on him -- and that's the end of another of one of Canada's most troublesome pests.