In Korea, American Naval planes dive to attack targets behind enemy lines. Roads, railways and other communications are strafed to stop the North Koreans from building up supplies for an offensive.

Watch this direct hit on a Red ammunition dump.

Believing that a sound defence is half the battle, the R.A.F.'s getting down to some hard training back in Britain. Men of the R.A.F. Regiment at Watchet, Somerset, are getting the know-how about handling Bofors guns to defend air-fields against low-flying enemy jet aircraft. Down in the West Country to see things for himself is Air Vice Marshal Strafford, the R.A.F. Regiment's Commandant General. Vampires sweep in to the attack and the guns get ready to open up.

Emphasis at this R.A.F. Station is laid on speed, for that quality above all is the essence of modern airfield defence.
