

LYNMOUTH AFTERMATH

Back into Lynmouth, the little North Devon seaside resort now smashed to ruins by the great flood, her people return. For this is their home, the place where they lived, and worked, and were happy. Once, bright lights in houses that stood near the path of the river told of hospitality to be found within. Then the flood came - and now the survivors have come back to search among the rubble for their few belongings.

Wreckage on the seashore tells its own story of that dreadful night. And still the sea yields up all that remains of those who lived and died in the little town.

But the people of Lynmouth are not beaten. The flood could not take away their courage and determination, and they plan to build anew. The nation (lead by Her Majesty the Queen), and indeed the world, heard their cry for assistance - and generously have they given. Accommodation is quickly being provided for the homeless, and already work is under way to clear a site where the new town will be built. Lynmouth shall not die, for here are Devon folk.

But the people of Lymouth are not beaten. The town they loved and some of the people they loved are gone. But the flood could not take away their courage and determination, and they plan to build anew. The nation (lead by Her Majesty the Queen) and indeed the world, heard their cry for assistance - and generously have they given. Accommodation is quickly being provided for the homeless and already work is under way to clear a site where the new town will be built. Lymouth shall not die as her people have died, for these are Devon folk.
