THE DUKE'S TOUR CONTINUES

"I'll go anywhere to see a new playing field opened" says the Duke of Edinburgh. In Buckinghamshire, starting at Eton Wick, and going on to Haddenham, Cuddington, Aylesbury and Bletchley, he opens six in a single day.

The National Playing Fields movement is an enterprise the Duke took over from the late King, George VI, and with great energy he has raised money and roused local authorities throughout the land. With a young couple at Buckingham Palace, the young people of Britain are coming into their own.

Then at Gillingham, the Duke unveiled an extension to the Chatham naval war memorial.

NAT. SOUND

We are an island people, and in times of war the Navy pays a heavy price to protect our land. The names of the brave are inscribed in these fifty bronze tablets, but they are etched more deeply in the hearts of kinsfolk who watch the moving ceremony.

We will remember them - they that go down to the sea in ships.
