

KING HUSSEIN ENTHRONED

For three days, the city of Amman, the capital of Jordan, celebrates the enthronement of King Hussein. 100,000 Arabs cheer the royal parade, as the king is driven to Parliament House for the ceremony and to take the oath.

Within Parliament House, the Prime Minister offers the loyalty of his fellow countrymen. Before his counsellors, the King takes the oath and vows to uphold the constitution and to be loyal to the nation, and, in a brief speech, refers to the heavy task which faces the armies of Jordan.

The king leaves Parliament after the ceremony and with a bearing that tells of his Sandhurst training, inspects a guard of honour. King Hussein, who was a scholar at Harrow, has already instilled in his people a new hope, born of his country's increasing national unity.
