

5-P2E201

The "Outside-Inside" House, nestled on a hillside in Beverly Hills, is today's house of tomorrow. Parking their cars on projecting, steel-grooved tracks, visitors walk toward the house on a bridge spanning the swimming pool -- part inside and part outside. Trees, shrubbery and flowers -- everything that should be outside is inside -- even this artistic waterfall -- electrically-controlled.

A tunnel leads into the living room of the hillside home, where its owner, Hal Hayes, taps the tap with amazing results -- champagne for the lady and bourbon for himself. Here's hoping the plumbing doesn't leak and a toast to the future.

Nature, nature everywhere -- the dining room table is supported by trees, while a plastic curtain can blackout the "outside-inside."

Let's try the pool, one of the guests suggests. And sooner than you can say sip, ~~xxxxxxxx~~ this girl obliges. There's nothing like the comfort's of home. Come in, come in, the water is fine.

This, if you'll pardon the expression, is REALLY LIVING!

OUTSIDE, INSIDE HOUSE

In Beverly Hills, California, stands today's house of tomorrow. Steel greaved tracks provide overhanging parking space for visitors' cars. To get to the house there's a bridge over half the swimming pool - the other half is inside. Yew, that's what is odd about this house; everything that should be outside is inside, trees, flowers and shrubs - even a waterfall.

A tunnel leads into the living room, where the proud owner Hal Hayes has another trick up his sleeve - a complete saloon bar, on tap.

Nature, nature everywhere - right through the dining table as well. And after lunch, how about a dip in the pool. Just move over to the other side of the room - and sip, you're all set.

California, here I come!