KOREA - HOME IN SIGHT.

High on a ridge overlooking no-man's-land in Korea, United Nations troops begin the job of dismantling their arms. For more than three years men have fought and died on these barren hills, but now an armistice has been declared and all that remains is to withdraw to the truce line and wait to return home.

To have walked here but a few days ago would have meant instant death, for only half a mile away, Bunker's Hill is in Communist hands. A battle-weary G.I. salutes the new peace, in the way he knows best.

Slowly, suspiciously comes the first hesitant meeting between former enemies. United Nations troops will continue to keep watch in Korea. But in Islington, Mrs. Humblestone is already preparing to welcome her son Tom home again. For months she believed he had been killed in action with the Royal Fusiliers. Now she learns the glad news - Tom has been released with other wounded prisoners from a North Korean camp - and her heart is full of joy.

Neighbours gather round Mrs. Iris Moxham to read a telegram delivered to her home in Wealdstone which tells her that her husband Fred is also among the first to be freed. It is more than three years since she saw Fred.

At 79 Handel Street in Liverpool, another telegram tells the Murphy family that their son, Bernard, is safe. Ever since he was posted as missing last October the Murphy's have prayed that all might be well. Now their fears are swept away. With new hope they look to the future - their boy is coming back to them.
