

The liner Gothic drops anchor at Aden. She has travelled about eighteen and a half thousand miles around the globe, and Aden, the gateway between East and West, is her last port of call. On her journey she has taken our Queen to many lands, to meet many people. The scene at Aden is typical - thousands of cheering, loyal subjects, welcoming their own Queen on their own soil.

Important as a coal and oil station as well as a trade route, Aden has a mixed population of Arabs, Indians, Pakistanis and Somalis. Eagerly they gather for a glimpse of their royal visitors when in Crescent Gardens, Her Majesty and the Duke attend a great military parade. Taking part in the march-past are Government Guards, Aden Protectorate Levies, the Aden Armed Police and the Hadhrami Bedouin Legion.

Immediately following the armoured vehicles come the Camel troops.

Now, for the first time during the tour, the Queen holds an investiture in public. Air Marshal Sir Claude Pelly, Commander in Chief Middle East Air Force, receives the accolade. He uses a chair, following the custom of the Moslems, whose religion forbids them to kneel to anyone but Allah. The Councillor of the Kathiri State in Eastern Aden receives the accolade.

Although the temperature is about ninety degrees, the Queen appears cool throughout the lengthy ceremony. During her two-day stay in the Protectorate, the Queen expresses her confidence in the future of Aden, which she describes as an outstanding example of colonial development.

---

Released Monday 3rd May, 1954. 2-51820

52 The liner Gothic drops anchor at Aden. She has travelled about eighteen and a half thousand miles around the globe, and Aden, the gateway between East and West, is her last port of call. On her journey she has taken our Queen to many lands, to meet many people. The scene at Aden is typical - thousands of cheering, loyal subjects, welcoming their own Queen on their own soil.

UP

95 Aden, important as a coal and oil station as well as a trade route, has a mixed population of Arabs, Indians, Pakistanis, and Somalis. Eagerly they gather for a glimpse of their royal visitors when in Crescent Gardens, Her Majesty and the Duke attend a great military parade. Taking part in the march-past are Government Guards, Aden Protectorate Levies, the Aden Armed police and the Hadhrami Bedouin Legion.

UP

150 Immediately following the armoured vehicles come the Camel troops.

UP

162 Now, for the first time during the tour, the Queen holds an investiture in public. Air Marshal Sir Claude Pelly, Commander in Chief Middle East Air Force, receives the accolade. He uses a chair, following the custom of the Moslems, whose religion forbids them to kneel to anyone but Allah. The Councillor of the Kathiri State in Eastern Aden receives the accolade.

UP

200 Although the temperature is about ninety degrees, the Queen appears cool throughout the lengthy ceremony. During her two-day stay in the Protectorate, the Queen expresses her confidence in the future of Aden, which she describes as an outstanding example of colonial development.