

INDIAN TRIBESMEN RETURN HOME.

The silent, ravaged ruins of a thousand year old fort overlook the tiny Indian village of Chittergraph. When it was captured by invaders four hundred years ago, the tribesmen left the fort - vowing never to return until it was free.

Today, four thousand descendants of the liberty loving men are coming back. Led by Premier Nehru, they are ending four centuries of self-imposed exile and endless wandering.

Passing through the arch into the sprawling, twelve-square mile grounds, the tribesmen come with the assurance that their fort is free.

Oriental music provides a native background for the return of the wanderers. It is a day of achievement for Premier Nehru, a day of homecoming for a proud people.
