

WAR ORPHANS'S TEA PARTY

As a grand finale to their two day visit to London, seventy children whose fathers were killed in action attend a tea party given at St. James' Palace. The children come from all over Britain and are entertained by the Soldiers' Sailors' and Airmen's Families Association to mark its seventieth birthday.

It falls to little Frances Richards of Redruth Cornwall to welcome Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother whose presence at the tea party sets the seal on all the excitements of the past two days.

Seven youngsters blow out seventy candles in one almighty puff before the Queen Mother cuts the birthday cake following which they started eating all over again.
