

DUKE IN DENMARK.

While Copenhagen prepares to welcome the Duke of Edinburgh, the King of Denmark is there on the quayside with true scandinavian informality to watch the Royal yacht Britannia come to her moorings. The Duke is coming to visit the British Trade Exhibition which has proved such an outstanding success in the Danish capital.

The Britannia docks, and the King is the first aboard her to greet his British visitor.

Described by the Danish Prime Minister as unparalleled in his country's history, the British Exhibition has drawn huge crowds to Copenhagen's Tivoli Gardens. But it's more packed than ever today when the Duke of Edinburgh arrives for a tour of inspection.

British industrial goods have flowed to Denmark for generations in exchange for the output of her farms, and the two countries have a well-founded respect for each other's products. This event, which is more like a festival than a mere exhibition, is doing much to strengthen that respect still further.

A fashion parade is one of the most popular attractions - and attraction is certainly the right word. Yes, it rains in Denmark too, so there's rainwear and umbrellas on show - though just as in Britain, it's much more interesting for everyone when the sun shines. Denmark has wonderful beaches, and almost all Danish girls are blondes. What a country!

A real British pub has been built specially for the occasion. And as it's the only British pub for hundreds of miles, it does a royal trade!
