

QUEEN AT CIRCUS.

At Olympia, the Queen attends a special performance of the Circus with the Duke of Edinburgh and Princess Margaret. Clown Percy Hunter presents a bouquet to the Queen as she meets the performers before the show begins.

For Princess Margaret, too, there is a bouquet.

For the Duke of Edinburgh, a set of riding crops presented by a lad from the London Federation of Boy's Clubs - a very appropriate gift from the youth movement in which His Royal Highness takes a great personal interest.

Schaefer's midget's line up to meet the Queen. This item of 30 little people are a big hit at this year's circus. Although they average only 33 inches in height, they are not dwarfs, but perfectly formed adult men and women, so versatile that they can put on a complete circus performance by themselves. The troupe's headquarters are in Germany, but its members come from several Continental countries.

After the performers have been introduced to the Royal party, the show begins. And what a show it is!

Here's a girl with a weight on her mind. We tried turning the camera upside down, but they looked the same that way - not surprising, because they're sisters. They call themselves the Mascotts.

Next time you see a pink elephant driving the car in front, don't worry too much - it might be real. And if the car develops engine trouble there's still no need to worry, because the driver's a highly skilled mechanic.
